Meaningful and freely given relationships are essential to our wellbeing. Finding pathways to relationships is a lifelong journey. For people with developmental disabilities, it may require thoughtful reflection, strategic planning and intentional facilitation. Relationships and friendships open doors to new worlds, helps discover self-identity and interests, and provides natural support when we need it. A significant role for staff hired by families through FMS or FSCD is not to be a paid friend, but to be the bridge to freely given friendships and relationships.

This session will explore:

- The meaning and power of natural pathways
- Capitalizing on individual interests and linking them to community opportunities
- The role of the facilitator
- Strategies for facilitating relationships in our community

Families, self-advocates, and FMS staff are welcome to attend.
